But those terms are not part of the Package. It is only for pictures and photo-editing software. But nothing about it includes 'artistic' features. I would never use it, it doesn't have what I am looking for. A brief description: It is like a pencil or airbrush. Simply put, this is a really strong and durable pencil that allows you to graphically improve your photos. Adjust colors, add layers, and improve clarity. It can also be used for other things, such as graphic design, illustration, and other paper craft projects. All you have to do is point and click. Q: Why does my default.css file show when viewing my file directly via github repository url? I have a github repository, and a subdirectory of my repository contains my website. I am not using a *.gitignore. When I open my website directly in my browser via the repository url, my default.css file is showing as well. I know this because when I view the source for the file directly, it says the line so my question is, why is this showing when I navigate to my repo? Shouldn't this be an asset in my repository? A: Yes, you should keep this file in the repository. It seems like you've just uploaded it as a file that is stored in a separate directory. But it will be packaged inside your app as it would be in a production app.

Q: C# Creating XML nodes from serialized object? I'm creating an application where the user can select several options from a dropdown list and several text fields. After filling out the form, I need to serialize it and store it in a MySQL database. After serializing the form, I will need to turn it back into an XML file. How can I create an XML document with the serialized data in it?
