In for a 1-hour audio recording, I went with an off-the-shelf over-ear headphone from a major headphone manufacturer. I chose this headphone model due to its comfortable, well-designed design, relatively low price, and unobjectionable sound quality.Â The model had a solid-feeling molded headband, and a large, somewhat cushy ear cushion. The overall fit and clamping was very secure. The colored, textured padded headband cedarwood was very sturdy, and the total construction of the unit felt very solid. A cord that was quite long provided a low-noise, stable connection to the headphone, which can make a huge difference in the sound quality. The straight cable connection came out from the bottom of the headphone. This design allowed me to position the headphone as close to my head as I wanted, and yet be able to control the volume with ease. As is the case with most of the commonly available headphone models, the headphones included a detachable cable for connecting to the audio source (e.g., computer or iPhone), as well as ear phones for use as a headset. The cable was very sturdy and included a 5.1-millimeter audio input plug, a 20-foot 3.5-millimeter plug, a 3.5-millimeter plug for connecting to most mobile devices, and a 3.5-millimeter jack for connection to computers via the provided usb/audio dongle. If you have any questions about the technology of headphones and the language of electronics, please refer to the laptop training kit. The audio quality of the headphones was surprisingly decent. Being a over-ear model, I could hear a significant amount of ambient noise, though I could avoid the dreaded "environmental sound" by wearing the headphones with a hat. I was able to achieve the highest possible audio quality using the following headphone setting: Music: For PC use Music profile, High quality, and 44100 Hz. Video and sound is well separated..
